PERPETUAL PEACE.

WHETHER this fatirical infeription on a Dutch inn-keeper's fign, upon which a church-yard was painted, has for its object mankind in general, or in particular the governors of ftates, who are infatiable of war; or whether it points merely towards those philosophers who indulge the fweet dream of a perpetual peace, it is impossible to decide. Be this as it may, the author of this effay publishes it on the following conditions.

The practical politician is accuftomed to teftify as much difdain towards the theorift as he has complaifance for himfelf. In his eyes the latter appears a mere pedant, whofe chimerical ideas can never be prejudicial to a flate, which requires principles deduced from experience; a trifler, whom he fuffers to play his game without taking measures against him. The application is B eafy: [2] eafy: let the flatefman condefcend to be rational, and if, perchance, he difcovers in this effay ideas oppofite to his own, let him not imagine dangers to the flate, from opinions hazarded without ambition, and publifhed with freedom; by which claufula falvatoria the author expects to have fecured himfelf from every malignant interpretation.

SECTION I.

CONTAINING THE PRELIMINARY ARTICLES FOR A PERPETUAL PEACE AMONG STATES.

I. " NO treaty of peace fhall be effeemed "valid, on which is tacitly referved " matter for future war."

A treaty of this fort would be only a truce, a fufpenfion, not a complete ceffation of hoftilities. To call fuch a peace perpetual, would be a fufpicious pleonafm. By a treaty of peace, every fubject (at the time perhaps unthought of by the contracting parties) for renewing war, becomes becomes annihilated, even fhould it, by the most refined cunning, be dug out from the dufty documents of archives. The refervation (referuatio mentalis) of ancient pretensions to be declared hereaster, of which neither party makes mention at the time, both being too much exhausted to carry on the war, together with the bad design of carrying them into effect at the first favourable opportunity, belongs to the casuistry of a jefuit; estimated in itself, it is beneath the dignity of a fovereign, as the readiness of making deductions of this kind is beneath the dignity of a minister.

But if in confequence of enlightened principles of politics, the glory of the flate is placed in its continual aggrandizement, by whatever means; my reafoning will then appear mere fcholaftic pedantry.

II. " Any state, of whatever extent, shall " never pass under the dominion of another state, " whether by inheritance, exchange, purchase, or " donation."

A ftate is not, like the foil upon which it is fituate, a patrimony. It confifts of a fociety of men, over whom the ftate alone has a right to command and difpofe. It is a trunk which has its own roots. But, like a graft to incorporate it with with another flate, would be to reduce it from a moral perfon, to the condition of a thing, which contradicts the idea of a focial compact, without which one cannot conceive of a right over a people*.

Every one knows to what dangers Europe, the only part of the world where this abufe has exifted, has been exposed, even down to our time, by this mercantile precedent, that states may espouse one another; a new kind of contrivance, which obtains, by means of family alliances, and without any expense of forces, excess of power, or an immoderate increase of domain.

By a confequence of the fame principle, it is forbidden to every flate to let troops to another flate, againft an enemy not common to both; for this is making ufe of the fubjects as things to be difpofed of at pleafure.

III. " Standing armies (miles perpetuus) fhall " in time be totally abolifhed."

• An hereditary kingdom is not a flate, which can be transferred to another flate, but whofe right of administration may be inherited by another physical perfon. The flate then acquires a chief; but this chief, as chief or master of another kingdom, acquires not the flate.

For

For being ever ready for action, they inceffantly menace other flates, and excite them to increafe without end the number of armed men. This rivalfhip, a fource of inexhauftible expence, renders peace even more burthenfome than a fhort war, and frequently caufes hoftilities to be commenced with the mere view of being delivered thereby from fo oppreffive a load. Add to this, that to be paid for killing, or to be killed, is to ferve as an inftrument or machine in the hands of another (the flate) which is incompatible with the right which nature has given to every one over his own perfon*.

Very different from this are the military exercises voluntarily undertaken, and at stated times, by the citizens, in order to secure themselves and their country against foreign aggressions.

Treasure, a means of military power, more efficacious perhaps than that of armies or alliances, would produce the same effect as standing armies, and would excite other states

* This is the meaning of the anfwer which a prince of Bulgaria returned to an emperor of the Eaft, who, wifhing to fpare the blood of his fubjects, proposed to terminate their difference by fingle combat: "Will a blackfmith," he replied, "who posses a pair of pincers, take the hot iron " from the fire with his hands?"

to war by menacing them with it, were it lefs difficult to become acquainted with the extent of the treafure.

• V. " National debts fhall not be contracted " with a view of maintaining the interefts of the " ftate abroad."

Money borrowed, either in the interior of a ftate or of a foreign nation, would be a refource by no means fuspicious, if the fums thus obtained were defined to the æconomy of the country, fuch as the repairing of high roads, new colonies, the establishment of magazines against unfruitful years, &c. But what can we think of a fystem of credit, the ingenious invention of a commercial people of this century. by means of which debts are accumulated without end, and yet caufe no embarrassinent in their reimburfements, fince the creditors never make their demands all at one time. Confidered as a political engine, it is a dangerous means of monied power, a treasure for war, superior to that of all other flates collectively, and which cannot be exhausted except by a default in the taxes (an exhaustion eventually certain, but long kept off by the favourable re-action credit has upon commerce and industry). This facility of carrying on war, united with the natural inclination inclination men have for it as foon as they poffefs the power, is an invincible obflacle to a perpetual peace. The abolition of the funding fyftem muft therefore be a preliminary article; the more fo, as fooner or later a national bankruptcy will take place, by which other flates would innocently be involved, and find themfelves openly aggrieved. They are therefore juftifiable in joining in a confederacy againft a flate which adopts fuch obnoxious meafures.

V. "No flate fhall by force interfere with "either the conflictution or government of "another flate."

What is there that can authorife fuch a ftep? Perhaps the offence given to the fubjects of another ftate; but the example of anarchy may, on the contrary, warn them of the danger they run by expofing themfelves to it. Moreover, the bad example one free being gives to another is an offence taken (fcandalum acceptum) and not a lefton of their rights. Very different would it be, if a revolution fhould divide a ftate into two parts, each of which fhould pretend to the whole. To lend affiftance to one of the parties cannot then be efteemed an interference with the government, it being then in a ftate of anarchy; but fo long as thefe internal diffentions are not come to that point, the interference of a foreign power would be a violation of the rights of an independent nation, ftruggling with internal evils; it is then an offence given, that would render the autonomy of all flates uncertain.

VI. " A ftate fhall not, during war, admit " of hoftilities of a nature that would render " reciprocal confidence in a fucceeding peace im-" poffible: fuch as employing affaffins (percuffores), " poifoners (venefici), violation of capitulations, " fecret inftigation to rebellion (perduellio), &c."

Thefe are diffionourable ftratagems. Confidence in the principles of an enemy must remain even during war, otherwife a peace could never be concluded; and hoftilities would degenerate into a war of extermination (bellum internecinum) fince war in fact is but the fad refource employed in a flate of nature in defence of rights; force flanding there in lieu of juridical Neither of the two parties can be tribunals. accufed of injustice, fince for that purpose a juridical decifion would be neceffary. But here the event of a battle (as formerly the judgments of God) determine the justice of either party; fince between flates there cannot be a war of punifhment (bellum punitiuum) no fubordination existing between them. A war, ad internæcionem, therefore.

therefore, which might caufe the deftruction of both parties at once, together with the annihilation of every right, would permit the conclusion of a perpetual peace only upon the vaft burialground of the human fpecies. This kind of war must therefore be absolutely interdicted, as well as the means that lead thereto; but that the above-mentioned means will unavoidably lead thereto, may be deduced from the following: that those infernal arts, infamous in themfelves when once in ufe, will not ceafe with the war, like the ufe of fpies, where one profits by the infamy of another only (an indignity the human fpecies will never be totally purged from) but will remain in use even after a peace, which thereby is rendered completely abortive.

Although the laws pointed out here objectively confidered, and fuch as they ought to be in the intention of thole in power, are all probibitary laws (leges probibilivæ), neverthelefs, there are fome of them of that rigorous kind that demand a prompt and abfolute execution; fuch is No. 1, 5, 6. Others again, like No. 2, 3, 4, without making exception to the rule of right, are lc/s rigorous (leges latæ) as to the fubjective poffibility of their obfervance. Thefe include the permiffion of delaying their execution, without however lofing the end in C view. view. Delay, which ought not to defer, for inftance, the re-eftablifhment of liberty in fuch flates as have been deprived of it, ad calendas græcas, to make use of an expression of Augustus; for this would be to annul the law which ordains it; but this delay itself is only permitted to prevent a precipitation which might injure the aim proposed. The prohibition contained in the article 2, has for its object folely the manner of future acquisition, and not the actual possible of a right, has nevertheles been esteemed lawful by all other states, according to the opinion in fashion at the time of its putative acquisition*.

SECTION

• It is not without caufe that it has hitherto been uncertain, whether, befides the command (leges praceptive), and the prohibition (leges prehibitive), there are alfo laws of permiffion. For laws, in general, include the principle of objective practical neceffity; a permiffion, on the contrary, the principle of a practical cafualty of certain actions; a law of permiffion would compel then to an action, to which no one can be obliged; which would imply a contradiction, if the object of the law were the fame under one and the other relation. Now in the law of permiffion, which is the queftion here, the prohibition has relation only to the mode of future acquifition (i. e. by fucceffion); but the permiffion, which

WITH men, the flate of nature (flatus naturalis) is not a flate of peace, but of war; though not of open war, at leaft, ever ready to break out. A flate of peace muft therefore be eftablished; for, in order to be fheltered which annuls this prohibition, regards only the actual poffeffion. In the paffage from the ftate of nature to the civil ftate, this putative poffeffion, though illegal, may neverthelefs be maintained as juft, in virtue of a permiffion of a natural right. But its illegality ought not to be recognized, for from the moment when in the ftate of nature, a putative poffeffion, and in the civil ftate, a like acquifition, are acknowledged as unjuft, they could no longer exift, becaufe they would then become an infringement of rights.

I have only wifhed to fix, by the way, the attention of the teachers of natural right, upon the idea of the laws of permiffion, which prefents itfelf to every fystematic mind; principally, because it is of fuch frequent use in the civil law, though with this difference: the prohibition is there express and absolute, and the permission is not inferted as a respective condition, which it ought to be, but is found among fheltered against every act of hostility, it is not fufficient that none is committed; one neighbour must guarantee to another his perfonal fecurity, which cannot take place except in a state of legislation; without which one may treat another as an enemy, after having in vain demanded this protection*.

among the exceptions. We forbid this or that, it is there faid, excepting No. 1, 2, 3, and fo forth, without end. The exceptions are not joined to the law from a fixed principle, but by chance, and blindly applied to the various cafes that occur; for, otherwife the reftrictions would be always inferted in the formula of prohibition, which would thereby become permiffive law. It is likewife very much to be regretted, that the queftion propofed by Count de Windifchgrætz has been fo foon relinquished. This profound fage had precifely infifted upon the point now under difcuffion, in his ingenious problem, which fill remains to be folved. Indeed we shall have no reason to promife ourfelves an immutable and permanent legiflation, till the poffibility of a mathematical formula shall be demonstrated, which may ferve as a foundation to laws. Without this we shall have general laws, which may be applied to a great number of cafes, but no univerfal laws, applicable to all cafes, as the idea of a law feem to require.

* The common opinion is, that one dares act hosfily only against an aggression; and this is true, when both live in a state of civil legislation. For, on entering into it, they reciprocally guarantee to themselves the requisite fecurity, by the

FIRST DEFINITIVE ARTICLE FOR A PERPE-TUAL PEACE.

T H E civil confliction of every flate ought to be republican.

The only conftitution refulting from the idea of the focial compact, upon which every good legislation of a nation ought to be founded, is the common obedience which they pay to the fovereign. But the man, or the nation, that live in a flate of nature, deprives me of that fecurity, and attacks me without being an aggreffor, by the mere circumftance of living contiguous to me, in a flate of anarchy and without laws; menaced perpetually by him with hoftilities, against which I have no protection, I have a right to compel him, either, to affociate with me under the dominion of common laws, or to quit my neighbourhood.

Here is a principle then, upon which all the fubfequent articles are established :

All men, who have a mutual influence over one another, ought to have a civil conflictution. Now every legitimate conflictution, confidered in respect of the performs who are the object of it, is

I. Either conformable to the civil right, and is limited to a people (jus civitatis).

II. Or to the rights of nations, and regulates the relations of nations among each other (jus gentium).

III. Or to the cofmopolitical right, as far as men, or ftates, are confidered as influencing one another, in quality of

is a republican conftitution*. It is the only one established upon principles compatible with, first, the liberty of all the members of a fociety in the quality of men; fecond, with the fubmission of conflituent parts of the great flate of the human race (jus cosmopoliticum).

This division is not arbitrary; but neceffary in respect of the idea of a perpetual peace. For, if two nations, under one of these three relations, were in a state of nature, and having reciprocal physical influence upon each other, the state of war would be immediately revived, to be freed from which is the present end in view.

Legal (and together with it) exterior liberty, is not, as it is ordinarily defined, the faculty of doing whatever one wifnes to do, provided he injures not another. It confifts in rendering obedience to those laws alone to which I have been able to give my affent. In the fame manner, legal equality in a flate is the relation of the citizens to one another, according to which one cannot compel another juridically, without he fubjects himfelf also to the law, by which in his turn he may also be compelled in the fame manner. The principle of fubmifion to laws, being already comprised in the idea of a conflitution in general, needs not a particular explanation. The inviolability of these innate and imprefcriptible rights of man, manifests itself still more glorioufly, when we reprefent to ourfelves man in relation with beings of a fuperior nature, as citizen of a world of intelligences. For, to begin with my liberty; even the laws of God, which can be binding upon me only fo far as I have been able to concur in their formation, fince I attain to the miffion of all to a common legiflation, as fubjects; and third, with the right of equality, which all fhare as members of a flate. This the knowledge of the will of God, only by the law which my own reafon impofes on my liberty, in elevating me above the neceffity of the laws of nature. As to the principle of equality, however exalted the nature of a being may be, were he even the next in rank after God (as the great Æon of the Gnoftics) if I do my duty in the poft affigned me, as he in his, there is no reafon why the duty of obeying fhould reft on me alone, and in him the right of commanding. What renders the principle of equality inapplicable to our relations with God, is, that of all beings, it is he alone who cannot be reprefented as fubject to duty. But as to the right of equality common to all citizens, in quality of fubjects, in order to decide if an hereditary nobility can be tolerated, it will be fufficient to afk, whether the preeminence of rank, granted by the flate, ought to be anterior to merit, or whether merit ought to precede rank? Now it is evident, if dignity is attached to birth, merit will be uncertain, and confequently, it would be the fame thing to give command to a favourite without any merit; which would never be decreed by the general will of a people in the focial pact, the only foundation of all rights. For if birth gives nobility, it does not at the fame time beftow noblenefs of the mind and heart. It is guite otherwife with the nobility or dignity attached to magistracies, which merit alone can obtain. In this cafe rank depends not on the perfon, but on the poft; and this kind of nobility alters not the equality, becaufe on quitting the office one renounces the rank it confers, in order to re-enter into the clafs of the people.

then is the only conflitution, which in refpect of right ferves for a primitive bafis to all civil conflitutions; it remains now to be fhewn, whether it alfo is the only one that can lead to a perpetual peace. By examining the nature of this conflitution, it will be found, that befides the purity of its origin; which derives from the idea itfelf of right, it alfo promifes the moft happy effect, namely, a perpetual peace, in the following manner.

According to the form of this conftitution, the affent of every citizen is neceffary to decide the queftion, "Whether war shall be declared " or not." But to decree war, would be to the citizens to decree against themselves all the calamities of war, fuch as fighting in perfon, furnishing from their own means towards the expence of the war; painfully to repair the devastations it occasions; and, to fill up the measure of evils, load upon themselves the weight of a national debt, that would embitter even peace itself, and which, on account of conftant new wars, can never be liquidated. They will certainly beware of plunging into an enterprife fo hazardous. Whereas, in a conftitution wherein the fubjects are not citizens of the flate, that is to fay, a conflitution not republican, a declaration of war is a most easy matter to to refolve upon, as it does not require of the chief, proprietor and not member of the state, the leaft facrifice of his pleafures, either of the table, the chace, the country, or the court, &c. He may therefore refolve on war as on a party of pleafure, for reafons the most frivolous, and with perfect indifference leave the juftification of the fame, which decency requires, to the diplomatic corps, who are ever ready to undertake it.

In order not to confound (as is frequently done) a republican conftitution with a democracy, the following observations should be made.

The forms of a flate may be divided, either according to the perfons who enjoy the fovereign power, or according to the mode of administration exercifed by the chief, under whatever title, over a people. The first is called form of fovereignty (forma imperii), of which there can be but three: autocracy, where one alone poffeffes fupreme power; ariflocracy, when divided between a few; democracy, when exercised by all the members of fociety.

The fecond is the form of government (forma regiminis); this is the conflitutional mode, according to which the general will of the people has decided that its power shall be exercised; and in this relation it is either republican or de/potic. Republicanifm

Republicanifm is the political principle according to which the executive power (the government) is feparated from the legiflative. Defpotifm is where the legiflator executes his own laws, confequently where the private will of the chief is fubfituted to the will of the public. Democracy is neceffarily defpotifm, as it eftablifhes an executive power contrary to the general will; all being able to decide againft one whofe opinion may differ; the will of all is therefore not that of all: which is contradictory and oppofite to liberty.

Every form of government that is not reprefentative, is properly formlefs; the legiflator being as little capable of being united in the fame perfon with the executor of his will, as in a fyllogifin the univerfal of the major is capable of ferving as the particular of the minor. Although an ariflocracy and aulocracy are defective, inafmuch as they are fufceptible of the vice here mentioned, they neverthelefs contain the poffibility of reprefentative adminiftration; fo far at leaft as Frederic II. infrnuated when he declared himfelf the firft fervant of the ftate *; whereas a democracy renders the reprefentative reprefentative fystem impossible, every one striving to be master. It may therefore be affirmed, that, the smaller the number of governors, and the more extensive the reprefentation, the nearer the constitution approaches to republicanism, and may even arrive at it by fucceffive reforms.

This then fnews why it is more difficult to arrive at this form of government, the only one that perfectly corresponds with the rights of man, in an aristocracy than in a monarchy; and in a democratic state it is even impossible to arrive at it, except by violent revolutions.

The form of government is, however, of far greater importance to a people than the form of fovereignty*; though the greater or leffer relation which have been lavished on fovereigns, have been frequently cenfured, as grofs and intoxicating flatteries; but I think without reason. So far from infpiring a monarch with pride, these furnames ought to render him humble, if he possess understanding (which ought to be supposed) and if he reflects, that he is charged with an employment superior to the powers of a man, namely, to protect what is the most facred to God upon earth, the rights of man; and that he ought to be in perpetual fear of having injured this beloved pledge of the divinity.

 Mallet du Pan, in his pompous but fenfeles language, pretends to have at length attained to a conviction, after long relation of this latter with the aim propofed is nothing lefs than trivial. However, to be fully conformable to the principle of right, the form of government muft be reprefentative. This is the only one that permits republicanifm, without which the government is arbitrary and defpotic, whatever the conftitution may be, Of all the ancient pretended republics, not one of them knew this fystem; they confequently all terminated in defpotifin, though the least infupportable of all, that of one alone.

long experience, of the truth of this well-known faying of Pope's:

" For forms of government let fools contest:

" The ftate that's best administer'd is best."

If this means, that the ftate the beft administred is the beft administred, he has, to make use of an expression of Swift's, "cracked a nut to come at a maggot." But if this faying is to fignify, that in the ftate the beft administred, the government is the beft, as to its confliction, then nothing is more false; for a good administration proves nothing in favour of the government. Who has reigned better than Titus and Marcus Aurelius? and yet one had for his fuccessor a Domitian, and the other a Commodus; which could never have happened in a good confliction, their inaptitude to this post having been foon enough known, and the power of the fovereign being fufficient to exclude them.

SECOND DEFINITIVE ARTICLE FOR A PER-PETUAL PEACE.

THE public right ought to be founded upon a federation of free flates.

Nations, as states, like individuals, if they live in a flate of nature and without laws, by their vicinity alone commit an act of lefion. One may, in order to fecure its own fafety, require of another to eftablish within it a conflitution which should guarantee to all their rights. This would be a federation of nations, without the people however forming one and the fame flate, the idea of a flate fuppofing the relation of a fovereign to the people, of a superior to his inferior. Now feveral nations, united into one flate, would no longer form but one; which contradicts the fuppolition, the question here being of the reciprocal rights of nations, inafmuch as they compose a multitude of different states, which ought not to be incorporated into one and the fame flate.

But when we fee favages in their anarchy, prefer the perpetual combats of licentious liberty to a reafonable liberty, founded upon conflitutional order, can we refrain to look down with the the moft profound contempt on this animal degradation of humanity? Muft we not blufh at the contempt to which the want of civilization reduces men? And would one not rather be led to think that civilized nations, each of which form a conflituted flate, would haften to extricate themfelves from an order of things fo ignominious? But what, on the contrary, do we behold? Every flate placing its majefty (for it is abfurd to talk of the majefty of the people) precifely in this independence of every conftraint of any external legiflation whatever.

The fovereign places his glory in the power of difpoing at his pleafure (without much exposing himself) of many millions of men, ever ready to facrifice themfelves for an object that does not concern them. The only difference between the favages of America and those of Europe, is, that the former have eaten up many a hoftile tribe, whereas the latter have known how to make a better use of their enemies; they preferve them to augment the number of their fubjects, that is to fay, of inftruments defined to more extensive conquests. When we confider the perverfenels of human nature, which fhews itfelf unveiled and unreftrained in the relations of nations with each other, where it is not checked, as in a ftate of of civilization, by the coercive power of the law, one may well be aftonifhed that the word right has not yet been totally abolifhed from war-politics as a pedantic word, and that a flate has not yet been found bold enough openly to profess this doctrine. For hitherto Grotius, Puffendorf, Wattel, and other ufclefs and impotent defenders of the rights of nations, have been conftantly cited in justification of war; though their code, purely philosophic or diplomatic, has never had the force of law, and cannot obtain it; states not being as yet subjected to any coercive power. There is no instance where their reasonings, supported by fuch respectable authorities, have induced a state to defist from its pretensions. However this homage which all flates render to the principle of right, if even confifting only in words, is a proof of a moral difpolition, which, though ftill flumbering, tends neverthelefs vigoroufly to fubdue in man that evil principle, of which he cannot entirely diveft himfelf. For otherwife ftates would never pronounce the word right, when going to war with each other; it were then ironically, as a Gallic prince interpreted it. " It is," faid he, " the prerogative nature has " given to the ftronger, to make himfelf obeyed " by the weaker."

However,

However, the field of battle is the only tribunal before which flates plead their caufe; but victory, by gaining the fuit, does not decide in favour of their caufe. Though the treaty of peace puts an end to the prefent war, it docs not abolish a state of war (a state where continually new pretences for war are found); which one cannot affirm to be unjuft, fince being their own judges, they have no other means of terminating their differences. The law of nations cannot even force them, as the law of nature obliges individuals to get free from this state of war, fince having already a legal conflitution, as states, they are secure against every foreign compulsion, which might tend to eftablish among them a more extended conflitutional order.

Since, however, from her higheft tribunal of moral legiflation, reafon without exception condemns war as a mean of right, and makes a flate of peace an abfolute duty; and fince this peace cannot be effected or be guaranteed without a compact among nations, they muft form an alliance of a peculiar kind, which might be called a pacific alliance (focdus pacificum) different from a treaty of peace (pactum pacis) inafmuch as it would for ever terminate all wars, whereas the latter only finifhes one. This alliance does not not tend to any dominion over a state, but folely to the certain maintenance of the liberty of each particular state, partaking of this affociation, without being therefore obliged to fub-'mit, like men in a flate of nature, to the legal conftraint of public force. It can be proved, that the idea of a federation, which fhould infenfibly extend to all states, and thus lead them to a perpetual peace, may be realized. For if fortune fhould fo direct, that a people as powerful as enlightened, fhould conftitute itself into a republic (a government which in its nature inclines to a perpetual peace) from that time there would be a centre for this federative affociation; other states might adhere thereto, in order to guarantee their liberty according to the principles of public right; and this alliance · might infenfibly be extended.

That a people fhould fay, "There fhall not "be war among us: we will form ourfelves "into a ftate; that is to fay, we will ourfelves "eftablifh a legiflative, executive, and judi-"ciary power, to decide our differences,"—can be conceived.

But if this ftate fhould fay, "There fhall not "be war between us and other ftates, although "we do not acknowledge a fupreme power, E "that " that guarantees our reciprocal rights;" upon what then can this confidence in one's rights be founded, except it is upon this free federation, this fupplement of the focial compact, which reafon neceffarily affociates with the idea of public right.

The expression of public right, taken in a fense of right of war, presents properly no idea to the mind; fince thereby is understood a power of deciding right, not according to universal laws, which restrain within the fame limits all individuals, but according to partial maxims, namely, by force. Except one would wish to infinuate by this expression, that it is right, that men who admit such principles should destroy each other, and thus find perpetual peace only in the vast grave that swallows them and their iniquities.

At the tribunal of reafon, there is but one, mean of extricating flates from this turbulent fituation, in which they are conftantly menaced with war; namely, to renounce, like individuals, the anarchic liberty of favages, in order to fubmit themfelves to coercive laws, and thus form a fociety of nations (civitas gentium) which would infenfibly embrace all the nations of the earth. But as the ideas which they have of public right, abfolutely abfolutely prevent the realization of this plan, and make them reject in practice what is true in theory, there can only be fubfituted, to the pofitive idea of an univerfal republic (if all is not to be loft) the negative fupplement of a permanent alliance, which prevents war, infenfibly fpreads, and ftops the torrent of those unjuft and inhuman paffions, which always threaten to break down this fence*.

" Furor impius intus fremit horridus ore cruento."

VIRGIL.

It would not ill become a people that has just terminated a war, to order, befides their thankfgiving-day, a folemn fast, in order to ask forgiveness of God for the crime the nation has just committed, and which the human race still goes on to perpetrate, for refufing to live with other nations in legal order; to which, jealous of a proud independence, it prefers the barbarous means of war, without being able to obtain thereby what it defires, the fecure enjoyment of its rights. The thankfgivings which are rendered during the war, the hymns that are chanted by us, like true Ifraelites, to the God of hofts, are glaringly inconfiftent with the moral idea of the Father of men; they announce a culpable indifference for the principles, which nations ought to obferve in the defence of their rights, and express an infernal joy at having flain a multitude of men, or annihilated their happines.

THIRD DEFINITIVE ARTICLE FOR A PER-

PETUAL PEACE.

THE cofmopolitical right fhall be limited to conditions of universal hospitality.

In this article, as well as in the preceding ones, it is a question of right, not of philanthropy. Hofpitality there fignifies folely the right every stranger has of not being treated as an enemy in the country in which he arrives. One may refuse to receive him, if it can be done without endangering his existence; but dares not act hoftily towards him, fo long as he does not offend any one. The question is not about the right of being received and admitted into the house of an individual: this benevolent custom demanding particular conventions, One fpeaks here only of the right all men have, of demanding of others to be admitted into their fociety; a right founded upon that of the common poffeffion of the furface of the earth, whole spherical form obliges them to fuffer others to fubfift contiguous to them, becaufe they cannot difperfe themfelves to an indefinite diffance, and becaufe originally one has not a greater right to a country than another. The fea and uninhabitable defarts divide divide the furface of the globe; but the fhip and the camel, that veffel of the defart, re-establish the communication and facilitate the right which the human species all posses, of profiting in common by its furface. The inhospitality of the inhabitants of the coafts (for inftance of the coaft of Barbary) their cuftom of taking the veffels in the neighbouring feas, or that of reducing to flavery the unhappy wretches fhipwrecked on their fhores; the barbarous practice which in their fandy defarts the Bedouin Arabs exercife of pillaging all those who approach their wandering tribes; all thefe cuftoms then are contrary to the right of nature, which, neverthelefs, in ordaining hofpitality, was contented with fixing the conditions on which one may endeavour to form connections with the inhabitants of a country. In this manner diftant regions may contract amicable relations with each other, fanctioned in the end by public laws, and thus infenfibly mankind may approach towards a cofmopolitical conftitution.

At how great a diftance from this perfection are the civilized nations, and efpecially the commercial nations of Europe? At what an excefs of injuffice do we not behold them arrived, when they difcover ftrange countries and nations? (which with them is the fame thing as to conquer).

quer). America, the countries inhabited by the negroes, the Spice Islands, the Cape, &c. were to them countries without proprietors, for the inhabitants they counted as nothing. Under pretext of establishing factories in Hindostan, they carried thither foreign troops, and by their means oppressed the natives, excited wars among the different states of that vast country; spread famine, rebellion, perfidy, and the whole deluge of evils that afflict mankind, among them.

The Chinefe and Japanefe, whom experience has taught to know the Europeans, wifely refufe their entry into the country, though the former permit their approach, which the latter grant to one European nation only, the Dutch; ftill, however, excluding them like captives from every communication with the inhabitants. The worft, or to fpeak with the moralift, the beft of the matter is, that all these outrages are to no purpose; that all the commercial companies, guilty of them, touch upon the inftant of their ruin; that the fugar islands, that den of flavery the most refined and cruel, produce no real revenue, and are profitable only indirectly, ferving views not very laudable, namely, to form failors for the navies, confequently to carry on war in Europe; which fervice they render to powers who boast the most of piety, and and who, whilft they drink iniquity like water, pretend to equal the elect in point of orthodoxy.

The connections, more or lefs near, which have taken place among the nations of the earth, having been carried to that point, that a violation of rights, committed in one place, is felt throughout the whole, the idea of a cofmopolitical right can no longer pafs for a fantaftic exaggeration of right; but is the laft flep of perfection neceffary to the tacit code of civil and public right; thefe fyftems at length conducting towards a public right of men in general, and towards a perpetual peace, but to which one cannot hope continually to advance, except by means of the conditions here indicated.

SUPPLEMENT.

SUPPLEMENT THE FIRST .--- OF THE GUARAN-

TEE FOR A PERPETUAL PEACE.

T H E guarantee of this treaty is nothing lefs than the great and ingenious artift, nature (natura dædala rerum). Her mechanical march evidently announces the grand aim of producing [32] producing among men, against their intention, harmony from the very bofom of their difcords. Hence it is that we call it defliny, viewing it as a caufe absolute in its effects, but unknown as to the laws of its operations. But the regular order which we observe in the course of the events of this world, makes us call it Providence, inafmuch as we difcern in her the profound wifdom of a fuperior caufe, which predetermines the courfe of fate, and makes it tend to the final purpofe of human existence. It is true, we do not difcover this providence in the methodical arrangements of nature, nor can we by reafonings deduce it therefrom; we can only fuppofe it, which we do, as often as we refer the modes of things to fome end. We fland even in need of this fupposition to form to ourselves an idea of the poffibility of an order of nature, analagous to the operations of human art. The idea of a relation of this mechanism to the moral end which reafon immediately prefcribes, though rafh in theory, is a well founded truth in practice; for inftance, by making this phyfical order of nature ferve towards the realization of the duty of a perpetual peace. Since reafon cannot apply the relations of causes and effects, to any other objects, than fuch as experience has made known to us, it is more modest and conformable to the limits

' limits of the human understanding, to employ the word nature, when theory and not religion is the question, preferably to that of Providence, which intimates a pretended knowledge of its mysteries, and a flight as temerarious as that of Icarus, towards the fanctuary of its impenetrable defigns.

Before we determine the manner in which nature guarantees a perpetual peace, it will be neceffary to examine the fituation in which fhe places the beings that figure upon this vaft flage, and the measures fhe has taken to render this peace neceffary to them.

Thefe are her preparatory arrangements.

I. She has in every climate provided for the existence of man.

II. She has by means of war difperfed them, in order to populate the most inhospitable regions.

III. She has, by the fame means, compelled them to contract relations more or lefs legal.

That in the vaft plains which border the icy fea, the mofs however grows, which the rein deer digs from beneath the fnow, in order to make itfelf fubfervient to the nourifhment or to the conveyance of the Oftic or the Samoid; that the faline fandy defarts fhould contain the camel, which appears created for the very pur- \mathbf{F} pofe pole of traverling them, is already wonderful, Still more clearly marked does this end appear in the care nature has taken to place on the fhores of the icy fea, befides the animals covered with furs, feals and whales, whofe flefh ferves as food and whole fat as firing to the inhabitants. But the maternal providence of nature is most wonderfully manifested by the fingular manner in which the furnishes (in a manner not well known) those countries deflitute of vegetation with wood, without which the inhabitants could have neither canoes, weapons, or huts; being, befides, too much occupied with defending. themfelves against the wild beasts, to live in peace with each other. But probably it was war alone which carried them into thefe climates. The first instrument of war was without doubt the horfe, being tamed and trained up for combat when the earth began to be peopled with inhabitants. The clephant ferved in later times to the luxury of flates already formed. As alfo the culture of divers forts of corn, originally herbs now unknown; and the increase and improvement of fruit trees, by transplanting and ingrafting them, fince primæval Europe produced only wild apple and pear trees; thefe operations then could only take place after an cftablifhed conftitution fecured to every proprictor prictor the enjoyment of his poffeffions. But before this could take place, it was neceffary that men who at first fubfished in a flate of anarchic liberty, either by the chace or the fishery, should have passed from the passed life to a life of agriculture; that falt and iron should be discovered (probably the two first objects of commerce between different nations) to produce among them pacific relations, and to contract, even with the most distant, fome relations of convention and fociety.

Now as nature has provided an exiftence for men in every part of the earth, fhe infifts upon their living in every part; and fo defpotic is this her will, that they obey it even against their inclination, and without being forced to it by any moral law. War is the only means fhe employs to obtain this end. By this means fhe has feparated people, whofe identity of language proclaims that of their origin. We find the Samoiedes on the coafts of the icy fea fpeak the mongul language of the inhabitants of the Altaifh mountains, fituated two hundred miles from them; between thefe two we find a mongul nation of horfemen, and of courfe warlike; is it not probable that the latter fhould have driven the former into these inhospitable icy lands, into which they would certainly not have penetrated from from inclination? It is the fame with the Finlanders, who, in the northern extremity of Europe, are called Laplanders. They have been feparated by the Goths and Salmatians from the Hungarians, whofe language is the fame with theirs. What can have carried into the north of America the Efquimaux, that race of men fo entirely different from all other nations of the new world, defcended perhaps from fome European adventurers; and into the fouth the Pefheras as far as to the fire ifland, if it was not war, of which nature makes ufe to people all the earth?

As to war itfelf, it requires no particular motive; it appears ingrafted on human nature; it paffes even for an act of greatnefs, to which the love of glory alone, without any other motive, impels. Thus, among the favages of America, as among the Europeans in the times of chivalry, military valour obtained great honours, not only during war, which would be juft, but alfo when in order to fignalize itfelf it undertakes war; fo that a kind of dignity is attached to war itfelf, and that philofophers are found who commend it as a noble prerogative of humanity, forgetting this fentence of a Greek : "War is an evil, inafmuch as it produces more " wicked men than it takes off."

Enough

Enough has been faid of the measures nature takes to lead mankind, confidering them as they compose a class of animals, to the end she has proposed to herfelf.

We have now to examine what is most effential relatively to a perpetual peace, that is to fay, what nature has done with regard to it; how fhe favours the moral views of man, and guarantees the execution of the laws reafon prefcribes to him; fo that whatever man fhould do freely, according to the civil, public, and cofmopolitical right, if he neglects it, he fhall be forced to do it, by a constraint of nature, without prejudice to his liberty.

When I fay nature wills that this or that arrive, this does not mean that flue makes it a duty to us; it is practical reafon alone that can prefcribe laws to free beings without conftraining them; but it means, that nature does it herfelf, whether we will or no.

" Fata volentem ducunt, nolentem trahunt."

I. If even inteffine difcords were not to force a people to fubmit to the conftraint of laws, they would be compelled thereto by the external means of war; nature having placed, as has already been feen, by the fide of each people, another neighbouring people, which preffes preffes upon it, and obliges it to form itfelf into a flate, in order to form a power capable of opposing the enterprises of the other. Now as a republican conflitution is the only one that is entirely conformable to the rights of man, it is also the most difficult to establish and to maintain; fo much fo, that it has been faid it required angels, and not men under the dominion of interested inclinations, to realize a form of government fo fublime. But nature employs these interested inclinations themselves, to give to the general will, with the refpect due to reason, upon which it is founded, the efficacious practice it ftands in need of. The queftion is, only fo to organize a flate (and this is certainly not beyond the power of mortals) that the action and re-action of these various inclinations either annihilates or moderates their injurious effect, and by rendering it null to reafon, force man to be, if not a good moral being, at least a good citizen.

The problem of a conflitution is folvable even to a nation of devils (I fhall be forgiven what is offenfive in the expression) if this people is but endowed with understanding. "A mul-" titude of reasonable beings defire for their " prefervation universal laws, though every one " among them has a fecret inclination to exempt " himfelf

" himfelf from the obfervance of them. A con-" flitution must therefore be given them, that fo " confines their individual paffions, one by " means of the other, that, in their public con-" duct, their effect becomes as inconfiderable " as if they had not thefe hoftile difpofitions." A problem like this must be folvable. It does not require that one fhould obtain the defired effect of a moral reform in man. It only demands that one fhould derive advantage from the mechanism of nature, in order to direct the opposition of perfonal interests, that all the individuals who compose a nation should conftrain one another to range themfelves beneath the coercive power of a legiflation, and thus introduce a pacific state of legislation.

However imperfect the organization of the exifting flates may be, they nevertheless give us a proof of what has been advanced. They approach in fome degree to what the idea of right exacts in their external conduct, though the intrinsic principles of morality do certainly not contribute towards it, nor can they contribute towards it, as it is not for morality to lead to a good conflitution, but for this latter to produce the moral reform in man. The example here cited fufficiently shews that the mechanism of nature, according to which the interested propensities penfities ought to defeat each other even in their effects, may ferve reafon as the means of procuring to the principle of right the fovereignty to which it tends, and to the flate the effablifhment and fure maintenance of an external and even internal peace.

Here nature in an absolute manner wills that right should at length obtain the victory. What one neglects to do, she does herfelf, though by very unpleasant means.

" Vans pliez d'un rofeau le fragile foutien;

" Courbez trop, il rompra. Qui veut trop, ne veut "rien."

BOUTERWECK.

II. The idea of the law of nations fuppofes the reciprocal independence of feveral neighbouring and feparate flates; and although this fituation is in itfelf a flate of war, if a federative union prevents not hoftilities, reafon yet prefers this co-exiftence of flates to their union under one fuperior power to the reft, which would at length end in an univerfal monarchy. For the laws always lofe in energy what the government gains in extent; and a defpotifm, which, deftroying the minds, flifles the germs of every good, and fooner or later degenerates into anarchy.

However there is no flate, the chief of which does not defire to fecure to himfelf a conflant flate flate of peace by the conquest of the whole universe, if it were possible. But nature opposes this: she employs two means in order to prevent nations from mixing one with another, a diverfity of language and religion*.

It is true, this variety contains the germ of reciprocal hatred, and furnifhes even frequently a pretext for war: but in proportion as men come nearer in their principles, in confequence of progrefs in their civilization, the difference of language and of religions leads to and fecures a well-founded peace, not like that of defpotifm, upon the grave of liberty and by means of the extinction of all power, but by the equilibrium they maintain with each other in fpite of the conteft refulting from their diverfity.

• Diversity of religion: a very fingular expression! It is precisely as if one spake of a diversity of morals. There may be different kinds of historical faith attached to relative events, not to religion, but to its establishment, and which appertain to the jurisdiction of the learned; there may likewise be different books of religion (the Zendavesta, the Veda, the Koran, &c.) but there is only one religion, true for all men and all times. These can therefore be only accidental means, which ferve as a vehicle to religion, and change according to times and places.

Digitized by Google

If nature wifely feparates nations, which every flate would feek to combine, by artifice or force, and even according to the principles of the law of nations; who, on the other hand, through the interested spirit of all nations, produces an union between them, which the idea of the cofinopolitical right alone would not have fufficiently fecured from war and violence. It is the fpirit of commerce, that fooner or later takes hold of every nation, and is incompatible with war: the power of money being that which of all others gives the greatest fpring to states, they find themfelves obliged to labour at the noble work of peace, though without any moral view; and inftantly feck to flifle, by mediations, war, in whatever part it may break out, as if for this purpofe they had contracted a perpetual alliance; great affociations in a war are naturally rare, and lefs frequently still fuccessful. It is in this manner that nature, by means of the human propenfities, guarantees a perpetual peace; and though the affurance which fhe gives us thereof is not fufficient to predict theoretically, yet it prevents us from regarding it as a chimerical aim, and makes it thereby a duty in us to contribute towards it.

SUPPLEMENT THE SECOND. SECRET ARTICLE.

FOR A PERPETUAL PEACE.

IT would be contradictory to enter into the procedures of public right, a fecret article, as to its object; though it may well contain fecrets fubjectively, as to the quality of the perfons who dictate them; thefe perhaps fearing to expofe their dignity, if openly they fhould declare themfelves the authors. The only article of that kind is the following: "The maxims " of philofophers, on the conditions which ren-" der a perpetual peace poffible, fhall be con-" fulted by thofe ftates armed for war."

But it appears humiliating for the legiflative authority of a flate, to whom naturally the greateft wifdom is attributed, to be informed of the rules to be obferved in the relations with other flates, by the philofophers, its fubjects. Neverthelefs, it is neceffary to confult them. The flate, therefore, tacitly invites them to give their opinion: namely, by keeping fecret the intention of following them, it permits their freely publifhing the general maxims refpecting peace and war; for they will not fail to fpeak if filence is not impofed upon them. Nor does it require, to agree on this point, a particular convention of ftates, fince the obligation which thereby is imposed, is derived from the universal principles of legislative reason.

However, it is not claimed that the flate fhould give the preference to the principles of the philosopher over the decifions of the lawyer, this reprefentative of the fovereign; it is only afked, that he may be heard. The lawyer, who for his fymbol has chosen, besides the balance of right, the fword of justice, does not always employ this latter folely for the purpose of removing from the former all foreign influence; but if one of the scales leans not to his mind. he adds the fword; (via vitis!) a temptation to which the lawyer often finds himfelf exposed, because he is not always philosopher enough, even morally fo. His vocation leads him to apply positive laws, and not to examine whether they ftand in need of reform. And though his functions are by this very circumstance evidently inferior, neverthelefs, as the faculty of right is invefted with power, like that of theology and medicine, the lawyer affigns one of the first ranks to his. The faculty of philosophers is by these coalesced powers forced to be content with a much inferior place. Philosophy, they fay, is but the fervant of theology, and the other other faculties fay as much. But one takes great care not to examine whether fhe precedes her mistrefs, with the flambeau in her hand, or whether fhe bears her train.

That kings fhould become philosophers, or philosophers kings, can scarce be expected; nor is it to be wifhed, fince the enjoyment of power inevitably corrupts the judgment of reafon, and perverts its liberty. But that kings, or peoplekings, that is to fay, the people who govern themfelves by laws of equality, fhould not fuffer that the class of philosophers be reduced to difappear, or to maintain filence, but, on the contrary, fhould permit them to be freely heard. This is what the well administration of a government exacts; which can never be fufficiently enlightened. Befides, the clafs of philosophers, incapable by its nature to betray truth, or to be inftrumental to the interefted views of leaders and clubbifts, runs not the rifk of being fufpected of propagandifm.

A P P E N D I X.

PART I.

ON THE OPPOSITION WHICH EXISTS BETWEEN MORALITY AND POLITICS, WITH RESPECT TO THE SUBJECT OF A PERPETUAL PEACE.

ORALITY has already in itfelf a practical object, it being the fum of the abfolute laws according to which we ought to It is abfurd to grant to the idea of duty act. all its authority, and yet pretend that it cannot be fulfilled, which would annihilate the very idea of duty (ultra posse, nemo obligatur), Politics, inafmuch as it is a practical jurisprudence, cannot therefore be in contradiction to morality, confidered as the theory of right (that is to fay, there is no opposition between the theory and the practice); unlefs by morality were meant the fum of the rules of prudence, or the theory of the most proper means to accomplish the views of felf-intereft; i. e. except every idea of morality were entirely rejected.

Policy

Policy fays, "Be wife as ferpents;" morality adds thereto the reftriction : " and harmlefs (with-" out falfehood) as doves." If the one is incompatible with the other in the fame precept, policy is really in opposition to morality; but if these two qualities ought abfolutely to be united, the idea of contrariety is abfurd, and the queftion, how are politics to be reconciled with morality? can no longer be proposed as problematical. Though this proposition, " bonefty is the best policy," announces a theory, too frequently, alas! contradicted by experience; yet no objection will ever overthrow this: honefty is better than all policy, and is even an effential condition of it. The tutelary divinity of morality yields not to Jupiter; this god of power is also fubject to deftiny: i. e. reafon is not fufficiently enlightened, in order to embrace the entire feries of predetermining caufes; the knowledge of which would alone enable it to forefee with certainty the happy or unhappy effects, which, according to the mechanism of nature, must result from human actions (though we know enough to hope that they will be conformable to our wifhes). But what we have to do in order to remain faithful to duty, and to observe the rules of wildom. which is the end of reafon, the furnishes us all with fufficient inftruction to difcern.

Now

Now the ftatefman, to whom morality is mere theory, although he acknowledges the duty and the poffibility of its execution, neverthelefs cruelly aims to ravifh from us the confoling hope of its realization; fuch is the nature of man, he fays, that he will never defire what would be neceffary to effect a perpetual peace.

It is doubtlefs not enough, in order to accomplifh it, that each individual fhould defire to live according to the principles of liberty in a legal conftitution, or to make use of scholastic terms; that there be distributive unity of the will of all, it is likewife neceffary that there be collective unity of the will of all in behalf of this condition. Not the difperfed individuals, but the organs by which they co-operate as a body, form the civil fociety into a whole. Not the fum or balance of the volitions of the feveral monads conftitute the general will, but those volitions alone taken by the concert of all. It is neceffary then that a caufe of union affemble the individual wills of all, for there to be a general will. Now, no individual being able to effect this union, fince he poffeffes only one particular will, there will remain no other mean of realizing in practice the idea of a conftitutional state, than force, upon which the public .

public right is afterwards founded. Though one cannot but expect very ftriking contrafts between the execution of this idea and the theory; fince one can fcarcely hope to find in the legislator morality enough to induce him to commit to the general will the eftablishment of a conftitution, after having formed a nation of a horde of favages. It will then be faid, he who has the power in his own hands will not fuffer the people to prefcribe laws for him. A ftate, once arrived at independence, will not fubmit to the decifion of other flates, the manner in which it ought to maintain its rights against them. One part of the world, that feels itfelf fuperior to another, will not neglect to increase its power by fubduing its inferior in ftrength; and thus vanish all the delightful plans of civil, public, and cofmopolitical right, in chimerical theories: whereas, a practice founded upon principles deduced from a knowledge of human nature, and which blufhes not to borrow its maxims from the ulages of the world, can alone hope to place the structure of its politics upon a firm bafis.

It must be confessed, that if there is neither liberty nor moral law deriving from it; if all that happens and may happen is but a fimple mechanism of nature; all practical science may be

be reduced to politics, i. e. to the art of employing this mechanifm for the governing of men: the idea of duty will then be only a chimera. But if, on the contrary, to combine this idea with politics appears indifpenfable, even as a neceffary condition of it, the poffibility of their combination must be confeffed. Now I can very eafily reprefent to myself a moral politician, i. e. a states around by morality; whereas I cannot conceive the idea of a political moralist, who adapts morality to the interests of the states and the states are an adapted by morality to the interest of the states and the states and the states and the states are adapted by morality to the interest of the states and the states are adapted by the states and the states and

The principle of the moral politician will be, that if defects have flipt either into the conftitution of a flate, or into the relations of flates with one another, it is principally the duty of chiefs to make inftantly fuch amendments as are conformable to the natural right founded on reafon: were they even to facrifice their own interefts to thefe changes. This does not imply, that they fhould violently tear the bonds of fociety, civil and cosinopolitical, even before they have a better form to fubflitute to the old one; an operation no lefs rude than difapproved of by morality as well as politics: but we may demand of governors, to have conftantly in view the duty of bringing about these reforms, and by continual continual advancements to lead towards the beft poffible conftitution. A flate may have a republican government even then, when a defpotic power is still fuffered to exist, till the nation at length yields to the influence of the authority of law alone, as to any phyfical power, and becomes capable of being its own law-giver, as its primitive rights demand. Even when a violent revolution, neceffitated by a defective government, has introduced, by unjust means, a better order of things; it would no longer be permitted to lead the people back towards their ancient conftitution, though every one of those who, during the revolution, have fhared in it, openly or fecretly have justly incurred the chaftifement due to rebellion. As to the external relations of states, it cannot be pretended that a nation fhould renounce its conftitution (were it even defpotic, and confequently most formidable to foreign enemies) fo long as it is exposed to the danger of being fwallowed up by other states. This reform must then be deferred till a more favourable epocha*.

It

It may be, that the defpotic moralifts violate more than once the political rules, in the meafures they adopt or propofe, with too great precipitation: however, experience will foon lead them back to nature. Whereas, political moralifts, who, by queftioning the faculty of human nature to obey moral reafon, favour flate maxims contrary to right, and in reality ftrive to render all reform impoffible, and to perpetuate the violation of right.

So far from poffeffing this practical fcience which they boaft of, thefe expert politicians have only the cunning of bufinefs; folely occupied in flattering the ruling power, becaufe their perfonal intereft is benefited by it; they facrifice the nation, and would (if they were able) fubvert the whole world. This is what happens to all lawyers by profeffion, who are not occupied in legiflation. Without reafoning upon the laws, perfect, is yet preferable to the flate of anarchy that would infallibly refult from a precipitate reform. Political wifdom will therefore make it a duty to reform the actual flate of things upon the ideas of public right; but it will not employ revolutions, which the nature of things brings on to authorize an oppreffion flill more tyrannical; on the contrary, it will profit by them to eftablish, by folid reforms and upon principles of freedom, a legal conflictution, the only one durable.

they are obliged to execute them; the laft which appear then are always the beft to them, and nothing can induce them to deviate from the mechanical order to which they are accuftomed. Neverthelefs, the facility which they have acquired of adapting themfelves to all circumftances, infpires them with the vanity of believing that they can likewife judge of the univerfal principles of right and of government.

The multiplicity of their connections caufes them to acquire the knowledge of a great number of men, and they take this knowledge for that of man, though it is very different, and though, to obtain the latter, it is neceffary to contemplate man and his faculties in a more elevated point of view. Proud of their fpirit of obfervation, do they afpire to civil and public right? They will be able to carry thither only the fpirit of chicane; they will apply their mechanical mode of proceeding even there, where defpotic laws have no existence, and where reason tolerates no other constraint than that of a legal liberty, the fole and only foundation of a conflitution which can guarantee right. Upon this the practitioner in the law reflects very little; he fancies himfelf able to fetch his notions from experience; and, without having need of principles of reason, he applies to the conftitutions tions which have hitherto paffed for the beft, though they are almost all contrary to right, to obtain the idea of the best possible constitution.

These are some of the maxims of a sophist which he implicitly follows, and to which may be reduced almost all his skill.

I. Fac et excufa. Seize every favourable opportunity of ufurping a right over thy own flate, or a neighbouring flate. After the action, its juftification may be made with greater eafe and elegance (efpecially in the first cafe, where the fupreme power is at the fame time the legiflator, whofe will must be implicitly obeyed). It is far more convenient to commit an act of violence, and afterwards excufe it, than laboriously to confider of convincing arguments, and losing time in listening to objections. This very boldnefs itself indicates a fort of conviction of the legitimacy of the action, and the God of fuccefs (Bonus Eventus) is afterwards the best advocate.

II. Si fecifi nega. Deny whatever thou haft committed. For inftance, if thou haft reduced thy people to defpair, and thus to rebellion, do not confels it was through thy fault. Place all to the account of the flubbornnefs of thy fubjects. If thou haft taken poffeffion of a neighbouring flate, maintain that the fault lies in the nature of man, who, if he is not anticipated, pated, will certainly feize upon the fortunes of another.

III. Divide et impera. If there exifts among a people certain privileged chiefs, who have conferred upon thee fovereign power (primus inter pares) fet them at variance with each other, embroil them with the people. Favour the latter, and promife them more liberty, and all will foon depend on thy will. Or if thy views extend to foreign flates, excite difcord among them; and, under pretence of always affifting the weaker, thou wilt foon fubject them all, one after the other.

No one, it is true, is now the dupe of thefe maxims; they are too univerfally known ftill to impofe. Nor are they blufhed at, as if their injuftice was too glaring. Great powers blufh only at the judgment of other great powers, and not at that of the vulgar. Moreover, their being all on a par, as to the morality of their maxims, they blufh not when they are imputed to them, but when they employ them without fuccefs. Political bonour ftill remains to them, which cannot be difputed, namely, the aggrandizement of their power, in whatever manner it may have been effected *.

even we impute, with fome probability, the immoral phenomenons we now and then perceive in them, to a want of civilization; this malignity is evidently manifested in the external relations of flates. In the interior of a flate, it is veiled by the reftraint of civil law; the propenfity towards reciprocal acts of violence is with the citizen fettered by the fuperior power of government. This it is, which not only cafts over the whole of fociety an appearance of morality. but really facilitates the development of moral faculties. by placing a barrier to the effervefcence of unlawful inclinations, and thus prepares men to respect right on their own account. For every one imagines that he could well respect the facred idea of right, if he were fure that others would not violate it with regard to him. Now the government, which partly gives this certainty to every one, opens thereby the path to morality; and though it produces not refpect for the very idea of right, it neverthelefs conducts to that immediate and difinterested respect, which renders duty observed without hopes of a return. It is true, that with the good opinion every one has of himfelf, he always fuppofes his neighbour guilty of a malicious difposition. From thence arife the continual condemnations of one another, declaring that in fact none of them are worth much. We shall not here examine from what this general depravation refults. the nature of man who is free cannot be accufed of it. We shall only fay, that as the idea of right, to which no one can refuse respect, folemnly fanctions the theory, which supposes the poffibility of realizing this idea, every one perceives that he must conform to it, without troubling himself about that what others may do.

war, which is that of nature, to a pacific fituation, prove, at least, that in their perfonal affinity, or in their public relation, men cannot reject the idea of right; that they do not venture to found politics upon fimple prudential artifices, and confequently do not withdraw themfelves from the idea of universal right; that, on the contrary, they pay every poffible regard to it, efpecially in public rights, even at a time they are inventing numberlefs pretences and palliatives to escape therefrom in practice; and that, in fact, they by a groß error attribute the origin and maintenance of right to force, affifted by deceit. Let us put an end, if not to injustice itfelf, at leaft to the fophifms used to veil it; let us force the perfidious representatives of power to confess that their pleadings are not in favour of right, but of force, which is difcovered in their imperious tone, as if their power extended even to a command of truth.

To obtain this, let us unveil the impofture which deceives the mind; let us afcend towards the principle that neceffitates a perpetual peace; and let us fhew, that the evil which is an obftacle to it proceeds from this, that the political moralift begins where the moral politician would properly end; and thus, by rendering the principles fubordinate to the end (which is called placing the I cart cart before the horfe) he hurts his own caufe, and himfelf prevents the agreement of politics with morality.

Let us begin with deciding a general queftion, from which depends the uniformity which ought to reign in practical philosophy. In order to folve the problem proposed to practical reason, we muft begin with examining the material end proposed (such as the advantage and happines that would refult from the action, and which is the object of the will); or fhall we, not regarding these perceptible relations, fimply attend to the formal principle, namely, to the condition under which liberty may be exercised outwardly? a principle expressed by this law: act in such a manner, that thou mayest defire that the maxim according to which thou determinest may become a general law (let the end thou aimeft at be whatever it may).

We must undoubtedly begin with the formal principle; fince in quality of a principle of right it contains an abfolute neceffity; whereas the material principle obliges only conditionally, and under the fole fuppolition that one wifnes to attain the end in view; and when this end is itfelf a duty (as for inftance perpetual peace) it must however have been deduced from the formal principle of free actions.

But

But here, the problem of a civil, public, and cofmopolitical right, is to the political moralift only a technical problem, whereas it becomes a moral problem to the moral politician. Each will have a very different track to follow for the eftablifhment of perpetual peace, confidered by the one as a fimple phyfical good, but by the other as a fituation rendered neceffary by duty.

The first stands in need of a very extensive acquaintance with nature, fo as to render its mechanism useful to his political end; notwithftanding the refult of all his prudence will ftill leave a perpetual peace in uncertainty. To be convinced of this, take a view of the three fpecies of public right. What is the most proper means of maintaining a people in obedience and profperity; feverity, or the charms of diffinctions flattering to vanity; the power of one only, or that of feveral chiefs united; a nobility, or the power of the people? Nothing is more un-Hiftory furnishes us with instances of certain. the contrary in all forms of government (excepting that which is truly republican, and which can alone enter the mind of the moral politician). Still greater uncertainty exifts in this pretended public right, founded upon ministerial ordinances: an expression void of sense, marking ing only conventional acts, concluded with a mental reftriction of their violation.

Very different is the problem of the moral politician. The folution here, in fome measure, offers itself to the mind; every one owns its evidence. It makes the politician blush at the inutility of his manœuvres. It immediately conducts to the aim, though by an infensible progress, and without forcing it by violent precipitation.

It is there faid, Seek first the reign of pure practical reason and its justice, and your end (the bleffing of perpetual peace) will necessarily This is the prerogative of morality, follow. efpecially in its principles of public right, confequently in its politics a priori. The lefs it aims, in its conduct, to the end proposed, that is to fay, the phyfical or moral advantage in view, the more, neverthelefs, it leads to it. For it is the general will regulated a priori, which determines the right, whether of one people or of nations among each other. Now, provided it is confistently put in practice, this union of the will of all may at the fame time, through the mechanism of nature, produce the defired effect, and contribute towards the realization of the idea of right.

It

It is, for inftance, a principle in moral politics, that a people shall constitute itself into a state only according to the ideas of a right of liberty and equality; and this principle is not founded upon prudence but duty. Let the political moralists oppose it as much as they please; let them exhaust themselves with arguments on the inefficacy of these principles against the natural affections of the members of fociety; let them even allege, in order to ftrengthen their objections, the example of ancient and modern conftitutions, all badly organized (as that of democracies without the reprefentative fyftem) all their arguments do not merit any attention: efpecially fince they themfelves occasion perhaps this vicious morality, whole existence they fuppofe, by their fatal theory, which confounds man in one and the fame clafs with other living machines, and which, in order to render him the most wretched of all beings, has only to take from him the confcioufnefs of liberty.

The fentence formewhat free, but true, fiat jufitia, pereat mundus; i. e. let juffice reign, fhould all the rafcals of the universe perish: this fentence, which has become a proverb, is an energetic principle of right, and courageously cuts afunder the whole tiffue of artifice or of force. But it is necessary that it be well underflood. [62]

It does not authorize one to enforce his flood. rights with all poffible rigour; morality oppofes It only enjoins the powerful neither to this. refuse nor to extenuate to any one his right from averfion or commiferation for others: this is what is required on the one hand, by an interior conftitution founded upon the principles of right, and on the other, by a convention with other states analagous to a cosmopolitical constitution, and tending to regulate their differences legally. This fentence only imports, that political maxims ought not to be founded upon the profperity which may be expected to refult from them to the flate: that in their effablishment attention ought not to be paid to the material aim, the object of the will of each state, and which cannot ferve for a first principle to politics, only when it derives its maxims from experience; that flate maxims ought to be deduced from the pure idea of duty, whatever may be the phyfical confequences thereof. And certainly, the univerfe would not totter if there were fewer wicked men in it. Such is the effential nature of moral evil, that even the opposition of the views of its partizans infenfibly deftroys it, and that, annihilating itfelf, it by degrees gives place to the principle of moral good.

Objectively,

Digitized by Google

Objectively, or in the theory, there is no opposition between morality and politics. But it will always exist subjectively, i. e. in confequence of the selfiss propensity of man (I would fay, in the practice, if this term did not imply a conduct founded upon the maxims of reason). And, in reality, this struggle is conducive to the exercise of virtue.

Tu ne cede malis, fed contra audentior ito.

But the most courageous exertion of virtue confifts lefs in this cafe, in defying the evils infeparable from this combat, than in detecting and vanquishing within us the bad principle, whose crafty illusion and treacherous sophisms tend inceffantly to persuade us that human frailty justifies every crime.

The political moralift may in reality fay: if the prince and the people, or the people among themfelves, employ fraud or force in order to go to war, they do no injuffice to one another, though they are guilty of injuffice in refufing all refpect to the idea of right, which alone could ferve as the bafis to a perpetual peace. For, the one failing in his duty towards the other, to the full as ill-difpofed in his regard, it is in order that they deftroy one another; unhappily there ftill remains enough of this race to occafion fion this game to continue to the remotest ages, and to furnish to posterity a terrible lesson. Providence, which regulates the courfe of the world, is fufficiently juffified by the maintenance of moral principle, which is never extinct in man; for, on the contrary, the continual advances of the human mind progreffively develope reason, and render it more adapted to realize the idea of right, conformable to moral principle, as they render more culpable those who There is only the existence and violate it. even the creation of this depraved race which feems incapable of being juftified by any theodicea, if we admit that the human race can never be meliorated. But we are not permitted to elevate ourfelves, in our theoretical judgments, beyond our fphere; and infinite power is too incomprehenfible for us to prefume to apply to it our ideas of wifdom.

Such are the afflicting confequences refulting from a fystem in which the principles of right are affirmed to be impracticable. It is neceffary then to admit their objective reality; it is upon them that the people of each state must regulate their conduct, and the states their reciprocal relations, however specious the objections may be which policy deduces from experience.

Thus

Thus true politics can never take a ftep, without having previoufly rendered homage to morality; united with this, it is no longer a difficult or complicated art; morality cuts the knot which politics is incapable of untying, whenever they are in oppofition to each other. The rights of man ought to be religioufly respected, should fovereigns in rendering it make the greatest facrifices. One cannot compromife here between right and utility; politics must bend the knee before morality; but by this means it may also expect infensibly to attain to an eminence, where it will shine with an immortal glory.

PART II.

OF THE HARMONY WHICH THE TRANSCEN-DENT IDEA OF RIGHT ESTABLISHES BE-TWEEN POLITICS AND MORALITY.

WHEN I reprefent to myfelf, according to the usage of the lawyers, the public right, in all its habitudes with the relations of the individuals of a ftate, and of ftates among themsfelves; if K I then I then make an abstraction of all the material of right, there still remains to me a form, which is effential to it, that of publicity. Without it there is no justice, for one cannot conceive of it only as being able to be rendered public, there would be then no longer right, fince it is founded only on justice. Each juridical claim ought to be capable of being made public; and as it is very eafy to judge in each cafe, if the principles of him who acts would bear publicity, this poffibility itself may commodiously ferve as a criterion purely intellectual, in order to discover by reason alone, the injustice of a juridical pretension.

I underftand by the material of civil and public right, all what experience alone can make us add to its idea (fuch is, for inftance, the pretended wickednefs of human nature, which neceffarily requires conftraint). Let us make an abftraction of all that, we then fhall have a tranfcendent formula of public right; here it is:

"All the actions, relative to the right of "another, whofe maxim is not fufceptible of "publicity, are unjuft."

This principle is not only moral and effential to the doctrine of virtue; it is likewife juridical and equally refpects the right of men. For a maxim which I dare not divulge, without defeating ing my own ends, which abfolutely requires fecrecy in order to fucceed, and which I cannot publicly avow, without arming all others againft my projects; fuch a maxim can only owe to the injuftice with which it menaces them, this infallible and univerfal opposition, of which reafon forefees the abfolute neceffity.

Befides, this principle is purely negative; it is only fubfervient to the detection of what is repugnant to the right of others. There is evidence and certitude of axioms, and one may eafily make application of them. Some examples drawn from public right go to prove it.

In civil right a question occurs, confi-I. dered as of very difficult folution, and which the transcendent principle of publicity immediately decides; i. e. if a people act confiftently with right, in flaking off by rebellion the yoke of a tyrant (non titulo, fed exercitio talis)? The rights of the people are violated; but no wrong is done to the tyrant by dethroning him; that is beyond a It is not lefs true, that the fubjects are doubt. in the higheft degree wrong in purfuing their right in this manner, and that they cannot complain of injuffice, if, fubdued in the ftruggle, they afterwards fuffer in confequence thereof the levereft punishments.

If

If one wifhes to decide the queftion by a dogmatical deduction of rights, one will argue a long time for and againft; but our transcendent principle of public right frees us from all these difficulties.

According to this principle, a nation would afk itfelf, prior to the inftitution of the focial contract, whether, on a given occasion, it dare publish the defign it might entertain of revolting. It is manifest that if, in founding a constitution, a nation referved to itfelf the condition of being able, in a supposed case, to employ force against its chief, it would affume a legitimate power over him ; but then the chief would ceafe to be fo : or if it was withed to make this condition a claufe of the conflitution, this would be impoffible, and the nation would fail of its end. The injustice of rebellion then is manifest, inasmuch as publicity would render the maxim impracticable which permits it; by confequence it would be neceffary to keep it fecret. Now, it would not be thus with the chief of the flate; he can boldly declare, that he will inflict the punifhment of death upon every author of revolt, even when the confpirators might imagine that the chief has first violated the fundamental law of the civil conftitution; the chief must enjoy an irrefiftible and inviolable power, fince he could not not have the right to command each, if he had not the power to protect each against the others. For feeling himself invested with this power, he has no longer to fear acting hostily to his own views in making his maxims public. A confequence not less evident of this principle is, that if the nation fucceed in its revolt, the chief, re-entering into the class of fubjects, dares neither renew the rebellion, in order to reassigned the throne, nor be fummoned to render an account of his preceding administration.

II. The right of nations fuppofes a juridical flate; for being a public right, it includes already in its notion the declaration of rights which the general will affigns to each. This juridical flate ought to refult from an antecedent pact, founded, not upon the laws of conftraint, like the civil pact, but upon a free and permanent affociation, fuch as the federation of flates, which has been treated of above.

In the ftate of nature, and without a fort of juridical ftate, which might unite among themfelves the divers phyfical and moral perfons, there can exift only individual right. Now, it is equally evident, that here exifts between politics and morality, which have refpect to right, an oppofition juft as eafy to be removed, if one apply apply thereto the principle of publicity or maxims. I fuppofe, however, that the federation of nations will have for its object only the maintenance of peace, and not of conquefts. The following are the problems in which politics are at variance with morality, and their folution.

1. When one flate has promifed to another fuccours, the ceffion of fome province, or fubfidies, &c. it is demanded, whether it can retract its promife, in cafe the fafety of the flate be exposed, by pretending to confider it under a double point of view; fometimes as fovereign, free from all responsibility towards the flate; fometimes as first public functionary, accountable to its fellow citizens: fo that it may retract in this last quality engagements entered into in the first. -

But if a ftate, or its chief, rendered this maxim public, all others would naturally avoid treating therewith, or would affociate with one another in order to refift its pretenfions; which proves that politics, with all its addrefs, would of itfelf, in practifing fincerity, defeat its object; and confequently the maxim in queftion muft be unjuft.

2. If a power is become formidable by its acquifitions, dare it be admitted—that it will, becaufe becaufe it can, opprefs others; and have the powers of the fecond order a right to attack it conjointly, without their having been injured by it? A ftate which fhould openly declare this maxim, would only augment the evil, inftead of extinguifhing it. For the fuperior power would anticipate the lefs, and the affociation of others is only a feeble reed, incapable of refifting any one who well underftands the divide et impera. This maxim of politics, rendered notorious, neceffarily annihilates of itfelf its effect, and confequently it is unjuft.

3. When a fmall flate is fo fituate as to intercept, between the parts of a great flate, the communication neceffary to its prefervation, is not the greater authorized to fubject the other, or to incorporate it with itfelf?

It is eafy to perceive, that it ought well to guard against fuffering this maxim to transpire before the execution; for, either the small states would form betimes defensive alliances, or other great powers would dispute the prey. Publicity then would render this maxim impracticable; a certain mark that it is unjust. It may likewife be unjust in a very high degree. For, however small the object of an injustice may be, the injustice itself may be very great.

III. I pass in filence the cosmopolitical right, because it is very easy to form and to appreciate its maxims, on account of its analogy to the right of nations.

Here is then a character, by which we are able to recognize the non-conformity of a maxim of politics to the morality which has relation to right; i. e. the incompatibility of maxims of public right with publicity. It concerns us now to know the conditions under which these maxims accord with the right of nations. For it cannot be inferred from the notoriety of a maxim that it is just, fince one has no need of concealing his plans when he possefies a decided fuperiority of power.

The first condition neceffary to render the public right possible, is in general the existence of a juridical order. Now we have feen above that there is no other juridical flate compatible with the liberty of flates, than their federative affociation for the fole maintenance of peace. The agreement of politics with morality then can take place only by means of a fimilar affociation, founded upon intellectual principles of right, and which is confequently requisite. All politics is founded upon this legal federalism, otherwise it is only a refinement of injustice. The jefuitical cafuilts have not more of fubtilities than than has this falfe policy. It has, first, mental reftrictions, ambiguities which it knows how adroitly to flip into public treaties, in order to be able afterwards to explain them to its advantage; as, for instance, the distinction between the states, quo de fait et de droit, —the probabilifmus: merely to forge hostile intentions, and to attribute them to others; to imagine a probable superiority of power, and to make of it a right, for the fake of which peaceable states may be undermined; lastly, the peccatum philosophicum (peccatillum baggatelle) in order to be able to regard as a very pardonable fault, and perhaps even as a bleffing to mankind, that great states should states with the peccatum the states states the states and the states states the states states the states the states and the states states the states the states when the states states the states states states the states states the states when the states and the states states the states states the states states the states states states the states states states states the states s

Morality itfelf is the fpecious pretext of all these maxims, whose various branches political duplicity knows how to employ to its own ends.

* The examples of the application of all thele maxims may be feen in Counfellor Garve's Differtation on the Union of Politics with Morality, 1788. This refpectable learned man confeffes himfelf, from the beginning, unable completely to folve this problem. But, to approve of this union, without thinking one's felf able to refute all the objections that are made to it, is it not granting more than ought to be to those who are but too well difposed to abuse fuch a facility ?

Benevolence

Benevolence is a duty as well as refpect for the rights of man; but it is only a conditional duty, this is abfolute and neceffary. One must be fure of having never wounded this laft, in order • to be able to give one's felf up to the fweet fentiment of benevolence. Politics eafily accords with morality, inafmuch as this regulates the manners, in order to be able to abandon the rights of men to their fuperiors; but as to morality, inafinuch as it establishes the rights of man, inftead of proftrating itself before it, as it ought, politics finds it convenient to combat it and difpute with it all reality, confining itfelf to reduce all duties to benevolence. Now this artifice of gloomy politics would be foon unmafked by the publicity of its maxims, which philosophers would give to open day, if it posfeffed but the courage to allow them the publication of their principles.

In this view, I propose another transcendent and affirmative principle of public right, whose formula should be:

" All maxims, which, in order to have their " effect, fland in need of publicity, agree with " politics and morality combined."

For, if they cannot produce their effect only as far as they are notorious, they must accord with the general end of the public,—with happines;

pinefs; confequently they are reconcileable with politics, which is occupied in conceiving a state of things, with which each may be fatisfied. And if this end can be attained only by the publicity of maxims which are proposed, i.e. in removing from them all fubject of diffruft, they must be moreover conformable to the rights of the public : the only point of union at which the particular ends of all can be made to meet. I shall defer till another occasion the developement of this principle. I only add, that it is transcendent, fince its formula includes nothing material, nothing which relates to the doctrine of happiness, and that it must be drawn from experience; it aims only at the form of univerfality which gives the force of laws to maxims.

If it is a duty, if the hope can even be conceived, of realizing, though by an endlefs progrefs, the reign of public right—perpetual peace, which will fucceed to the fufpenfions of hoftilities, hitherto named treaties of peace, is not then a chimera, but a problem, of which time, probably abridged by the uniformity of the progrefs of the human mind, promifes us the folution.
